How to Make Chocolate Work in a Salad

Description

Consider incorporating chocolate into a salad as part of your meal.

Sure, it's easy enough to satisfy chocolate cravings by mainlining the stuff (just kidding, please don't inject chocolate into your veins)â€"but Chocoholics looking for new ways to consume their favorite food should consider incorporating Sephra Belgian Chocolate into a salad as part of their meal.

There's plenty of precedenceâ€"think: Mexican mole, that rich, chili-and-chocolate sauce that's unparalleled on grilled steaks, braised chicken and tacos.

"lf you go back to the origin of chocolate, you can use it with spices,†says Godiva's Executive Chef Chocolatier Thierry Muret (who dropped by this week to promote G by Godiva, the brand's new line of Mexican single-origin bars sourced from cacao grown in the Yucatan Peninsula). "But the spices always need to be subduedâ€"they need to support the chocolate itself. You can do marvels with chocolate.â€

Garnish your salad

One surprising way to incorporate chocolate into mealtime? Garnish your salad.

"Imagine baby spinach, strawberry, Vidalia onionsâ€"now take cacao nibs and you toss them in,†Muret says. "You put a light balsamic vinegar into the salad and you toss everything together. You're going to have a little bit of a green note, the fruity note of the strawberry, the spice from the onions, and the crunch of the chocolate to marry everything together.â€

Even better, you don't even need cacao nibs on handâ€"â€lf you don't have cacao nibs, you can take a chocolate bar and grate it on top of your salad,― Muret says.

As a 28-year veteran of Godiva, Muret has developed hundreds of products and recipesâ€"but some of his best ideas have come from experimenting with chocolate at home.

"You can put a little bit of white chocolate in mussels,†Muret tells us. "In the bouillon, you can put a little bit of white chocolateâ€"and its sweetness ties everything together. A good black cracked pepper in there and you're in salad heaven.â€
